

A selfish manifesto in the hashtag age

I share these thoughts because sharing is something I do, not something I think about. This is the right place to be.

1.

I declare my life is lived better with technology. And life offline sucks.

I declare success translates into popularity online.

I declare when I feel the need to take a mirror picture, I post it, and get tons of likes.

I declare I am unique, and all overwhelming beauty must be captured on camera.

I declare that I reproduce my face according to famous archetypes.

I declare I circulate through online performance only.

I declare the need to connect with others; I use a lot of hashtags. #LOL

I declare that I live in a world with more data and less meaning.

I declare that all answers on life are to be found on the Internet.

I declare the real real is no longer real.

I declare I am joking. #Funny

2.

I fight against ruining my relationships based on Facebook status.

I fight against ruining my relationships based on read receipts on Whatsapp.

I fight against living without phone cameras.

I fight against cracking my phone screen.

I fight against going somewhere and not having free Wi-Fi.

I fight against silence.

I fight against becoming addicted to online shopping.

I fight against giving up. I try harder every day, #Motivation

I fight against being a copy of someone else.

I fight against going on a trip and not posting a selfie beside a natural backdrop.

I fight against sharing pictures of my body with someone I don't really love.

I fight against social alienation with my friends. #BFFs

I fight against leaving my bubble.

I fight against living in my bubble.

3.

I have a vision to stay true to myself

I have a vision to get a real connection on Tinder, and meet my other half.

I have a vision to never run out of data

I have a vision that my mobile is always fully charged.

I have a vision to create a pure symbiosis with my personal technology.

I have a vision to be like the mountains on my desktop, a sublime landscape full of mystery.

I have a vision of being no longer here, to disappear #VirtualReality

I have a vision to oscillate between the meaning of life and the everyday.

I have a vision to not believe what is imposed upon me, in front of me, wanting me to consume and foresee trends.

I have a vision to get lost in the woods and to never comeback.

I have a vision to be trapped in no man's land. #TheEnd